If the answer is yes, then the Australian Technology Network's e-Grad School's online Graduate Certificate in Research Commercialisation and Master of R&D Management courses can help. These distinctive 100% online degrees allow professionals to continue with their current commitments while interacting with participants in associated fields worldwide.

Larissa Melanie (pictured), a Project Manager in the QUT Learning and Teaching Unit is one such student who has found that her participation in the Masters program enhances not only her personal academic achievements, but also in turn provides relevant and transferable skills and knowledge back into her workplace. “Working at QUT in the Learning and Teaching Unit provides opportunity to engage and connect with academic and professional staff across all faculties and levels, and reinforces the need to cross fertilise research and development approaches with learning and teaching strategies for continuing innovative collaborations and interdisciplinary approaches.”

The Masters program provides future leaders and administration professionals in the research commercialisation and research sectors with a recognised qualification in research management and commercialisation. Ms Melanie said:

“The Master in R&D Management provides valuable insights for my work in supporting QUT staff in applying for national learning and teaching grants and the work of the Learning and Teaching Unit more broadly in advancing the scholarship of learning and teaching at QUT.

Up to the minute content on current issues and best practices are a feature of the program and Ms Melanie said *“The transference of knowledge and applicability from the Master R&D Management directly into my workplace, speaks loudly of the relevance and currency of the course.
